

Andrew Martey Asare is the Business and Community Development Manager for National Capital FreeNet, a not-for-profit internet service provider that believes that digital equity includes the right to affordable, high-quality connectivity that people can understand how to use while feeling safe online.

As part of his work, Andrew is developing a free community wifi pilot for neighbourhoods facing higher inequities, and other new services NCF can offer to ensure everyone is able to harness the digital skills and tools they need to participate in the community fully.

Andrew holds a Master's Certificate focused on Business Analysis from Carleton University and a degree in Business Technology Management from Toronto Metropolitan University. Before NCF he worked in the mobile phone industry, community digital literacy training, and for the government.
