Nielsen/consumer survey update

Changed Q765: As you may know, people can purchase or register rights to a name using a gTLD for a purpose like creating a website (e.g., “yourwebsite.org”). This typically includes ensuring that the domain name is not already in use, providing information about the person or company registering to establish eligibility to register and then paying a fee.

What are your expectations about restrictions on purchasing/registering a domain using each of the following gTLDs?

New Q890: Think about accessing a website with one of the newer domain extensions (the part after the "dot"). If the domain name extension in question is descriptive of a service or item, would you expect that all websites using that domain extension have a direct relationship to it?

For example, if you go to .bank, would you expect to see registrations by Banks across the globe? If you go to .paris do you expect to see domain names connected to the city of Paris? If you go to .film do you expect to see content related to films?
